Smart Objects. Smart Objects allow you to morph a simple layer into something complex. They are like a true Layer Mask, only more robust. I cover Smart Objects and Layer Masks in detail in Chapter 8. Paths. You can use paths to create vector paths out of shapes. And then you can perform all of your vector drawing, such as drawing and editing text, and so on. See Chapter 2 for more details on paths. Frames and Guides. Frames and Guides are choices for where your drawings move when you edit. They can be useful when you're trying to make certain parts of your drawing fit in or move together. I cover frames and Guides in depth in Chapter 8.

Adobe Photoshop is commonly used in graphic design, photo-manipulation and publication. It's not just good for creating cool logos, infographics and other stuff. There is a lot more to it! As such, below are 10 Adobe Photoshop tips for beginners that will help you get started. You can apply these tips to both Elements and Photoshop. 1. Formatting Shapes and Faces Adobe's free drawing application Kuler (formerly Adobe Kuler) is quite a powerful tool. It is easily one of the most useful programs in the Elements' suite. It allows you to easily rearrange most elements on an image including shapes, colors, text, and objects. In this article we will focus on three tips that will help you create customized graphics in Elements: Now that you have created a new image and opened it in Elements, it's time to start working on it. Most of the time there is just a little bit of formatting to do with the image. However, there are a few key elements that you'll usually need to pay attention to and to also change after you've made your edits. To make things more efficient, you can create a preset, apply a template, or add a filter. The Process: Create a new image Open the image in the app Open the image Go to File > Open as a Preset, or click on a preset you'd like to apply Choose the preset you'd like to use from the Presets panel The preset is now applied to the image and all the properties will be preserved. 2. The Filter Gallery The Filter Gallery is one of Elements' most useful applications. It allows you to apply a variety of filters to an image, such as blurs, boosts, and fakes. Once applied, these filters are automatically preserved when you make subsequent changes to an image. In this article we are going to focus on three tips: Using the Filter Gallery Applying Effects to a Group of Images Applying Effects to a Collection of Images The Process: Make sure you have a source image Open the image in the app Open the image Go to Effect > Filters > Filter Gallery Select the type of filter you'd like to apply Add the filter to the image Open the gallery again Select the filter 05a79ccef

You are here No news on active 'black site' About the same as last year January 11, 2009 In response to questions from the Far and Middle East Subcommittee, the State Department's Office of the Inspector General (OIG) provided updated information on its ongoing probe into whether there exists an active CIA "black site" facility in Afghanistan. The inspector general has not provided a response to questions from the subcommittee regarding the latest developments. According to the OIG, a management review of the black site facility has determined that it is operating as authorized by CIA Headquarters. However, the inspector general has not responded to concerns raised by the subcommittee about the nature and scope of the management review. In October 2008, the Committee held a series of bipartisan hearings on the black site issue and found that the U.S. government had sufficient and publicly available evidence to warrant a full inquiry into the existence and use of black sites. Although a number of witnesses provided information about the operation of black sites in U.S. custody during the course of those hearings, the issue of the existence of an active black site facility in Afghanistan had not been resolved. Earlier this month, the State Department acknowledged for the first time that the military was operating a black site in Afghanistan. The revelation surfaced in a classified memorandum by the intelligence community (Intell). According to sources cited in Intel, the black site was intended for the detention of detainees in the Middle East. It was also established specifically for the "enhanced interrogation techniques" (EITs) undertaken by the CIA on foreign nationals held in U.S. custody. The OIG's lack of a response to the inquiry by the subcommittee demonstrates that the agency has not taken the steps necessary to meet the subcommittee's concerns. As a result, the Committee needs to consider other options to ensure that the government answers its oversight questions. The OIG is currently in possession of an "emergency" referral of the black site issue by the Subcommittee to the Justice Department. The Committee seeks the information contained in the referral so that it can make an informed decision about the matter. A Cast of Loose Characters Welcome to Netflix's 13 Reasons Why. which is marked off by geotechnical markers. The aerial photograph is taken 2 – 5 years after grading has taken place. This allows the landowner to see if the land has settled and developed more with more work taking place on the land. Where access is required for grading by the developers, the planning authority can attach conditions for the noise impact and the area affected. This will be laid out for public inspection. These conditions should be checked by the developer as soon as possible. In this case the aerial photograph must be marked off before the start of building works. This lets everyone know what work has been undertaken. This could be done by marking out the construction site with geotechnical markers, although this could be time consuming and may not be practical in all cases. If we suspect there is a problem with the soil we will use a computer to search the aerial photograph for geotechnical markers. These markers could be placed in the wrong place, can be moved or placed in in the wrong place by developers or contractors. To tackle this, we need to ensure that we are on hand at the planning site to check the markers. If the research reveals there are clearly a number of settling areas on the plot it is still important to check that the developer will be able to comply with the planning conditions, especially when the developers have promised to do all they can to reduce noise impacts on the residents. The noise levels will still need to be registered by the developers and the planning authority. If a builder needs to do work directly on the land without access, a landslip is likely. In these cases the aerial photographs are taken as soon as possible after the access has been requested. These photographs are then used to check for evidence of any issues. There may be concerns about the building materials being used, or concern about a lack of information from the developer. If a developer has done all they can to reduce the risk they may still have a responsibility to ensure that if any concerns are identified during the site assessment, they are reported and investigated in a timely manner. INFORMATION ON THE NEW GEOCHEMICAL INFORMATION SYSTEM The National Infrastructure Committee (NIC) have today published in the press their ideas on how to reform the geological information system for the planning process. They set out a number of recommendations which should be taken into account when debating and making changes to the Geosciences (Geographical Information Systems) Code of Practice. The NIC believe that geologists and
